GOES AFTER RICE

Finally, when he saw that capture was inevitable, he gave himself up.

As he had shot an officer at Needles, the authorities there were inclined to hold him to answer to that charge, which was a more serious one than he was to answer for here, hence he was lodged in the county jail to await the outcome of his victim's injuries.

The day after he was lodged in jail, at Needles, Rice made a desperate but ineffectual attempt to escape. When the jailer entered the jail to feed him, he attacked him, knocking him down and dashing out the open door. The jailer quickly recovered himself and started in hot pursuit, calling to Rice to halt or suffer the consequences. The fugitive, always ready to take a chance, paid no heed. The officer then drew down and shot Rice through the back. He toppled over. Rice was taken to a hospital in San Bernardino, where attending surgeons pronounced his wound mortal and he was given but a few hours to live.

However, Rice fooled them. Though suffering intense agony from a jagged bullet wound in his body, made by a large bullet which went clear through him, missing his heart by a hairsbreadth, he gathered together enough strength to don a suit of clothes in a wardrobe in the hospital, and armed with a butcher knife, with which he terrorized the other patients threatening them with death if they made any outcry, he slipped out of the institution. A short while afterwards a nurse discovered he had gotten away and the officers were notified.

For a second time a posse was organized and started out to look for him. After searching some hours, they finally came upon Rice secreted under a railroad trestle, where he had collapsed from exhaustion. He was returned this time to jail. He was very weak from loss of blood and the physicians said he could not possibly survive the shock incident to the second escape. But Rice surprised them again by pulling through.

He has since entirely recovered and as the Indian policeman he shot recovered, Sheriff Romero was notified he could have his prisoner, and he will consequently be brought back. If he is sent to the penitentiary in this territory for the crime committed here, all right. If he should be acquitted, then he will be surrendered to the California authorities to answer for the shooting there.

In the meantime Sheriff Romero's return, with Rice, will be more or less anxiously awaited, for Rice is regarded as even worse than a desperate character.
